The Letter Carrier
RONALD THORPE

Who understood him? Not his brothers.

His father’s love had been drained away
long ago by the mill’s hot monotony.

The widowed aunt, once the others died,
tried when she was about to face her God.

Only his mother knew how to love him
no matter what he did or said or soiled.

She accepted what he was, never denying her oneness with her son
until her heart broke and left him alone.

After the war, he carried the U.S. mail
seventeen years, two months, and eight days.

When they fired him, they should have known he’d find a way to finish his rounds.
