LISA ZIMMERMAN

It's hard to know how much they love their children, these mothers and fathers reaching across a five-year-old lap to unlatch the car door or holding that mittened hand block after block to the brick school with its slide and gravel, the teacher with her inscrutable smile. Because at the same moment somewhere a child is being beaten by a parent who was beaten by a parent who was locked in a basement, or worse. It's hard to tell when you watch a woman bend down to kiss her small child what hurts most, in which family, on whose body.
