

Love Letter to My Imaginary Man after Pamela Alexander

CHRISTINE GRAF

Next time you walk by my bedroom in your hulk of spectral dust with a gust of Thor and thunder, stop pretending you are Mars on a broken axis with crusts of rock and bags of crockery, next time you walk past in your husk of tattered coats from your past, stop talk to me, touch me but don't look at me as if I wasn't there while I lie there.
I'm the one who's real, you're just a swaggering ghost, charming doppelganger bone banger, chain clanger in the mist.
You could say hello, with your mack truck trundle, dragging the bundles of chips you bet on red 23, as you clop along in your clap trap trot don't walk away you meandering, slanderous ghost who spread rumors that you've spent nights in my bed, you calamity of calumny, you slag heap of hot air, next time you walk past my bedroom in your flash of thin skin, pouter chest, stop you vaporous mole, don't go undercover, get in bed under the covers, lie next to me, speak to me in low tones, lie to me.
