Kenneth W. Cedergren, Editor
In the summer issue of the alumni magazine I said I would tell you more of my experiences this past June while in Livingstone, Zambia.

When I was Dean of the College of Business Administration at Ohio University in Athens, Ohio, I frequently lectured to off-campus seminar groups. Hence, when I was first invited in 1970 to participate in the African Advanced Management Program (AAMP), I was happy to accept this stimulating experience. Not only because it was a chance to again be in the classroom, but for what I could bring back to Bryant College from this unique program.

The AAMP program is designed for African executives and is modeled after the Harvard Business School’s Advanced Management Program, but tailored toward the cultural and environmental needs of African business. The AAMP is a non-profit program sponsored by International Management Development Institute, Inc., headquartered in Wilton, Connecticut. Unfortunately, its President and founder, John Larned, died in an automobile accident on his way to this year’s AAMP seminar.

I enjoyed very much being in a beautiful country like Zambia, sharing case studies with young managers and executives in a congenial setting, and helping them learn some of the techniques of management that American industry has proved to this young nation’s business leaders.

My associates at this summer’s AAMP seminar in Livingstone were Dr. James Lee, a professor at Ohio University, who taught Human Relations, Labor Relations, and Personnel; and Dr. Charles Hofer, a professor at Northwestern University, who taught Policy and Marketing. I was selected to teach Control, Operations Management, and Finance. I also taught the IBM business game.

I boarded Pan American Flight 56 in Boston on Wednesday evening, May 30, eager to see my AAMP colleagues and renew friendships with several of the Zambian staff. Crossing time zones, the flight landed in London Thursday morning at 8:10 a.m. I left London on Zambian Airlines on the afternoon flight to arrive in Lusaka, the capital of Zambia, at 5:30 a.m. Friday morning. Changing from international to a domestic flight, I was in Livingstone by 9 a.m. I had spent 19 hours airborne and 10 hours on the ground.

Each time I have arrived in Zambia it appears more beautiful. Our hotel and the conference site, was the Musi-o-Tunya Intercontinental. For you alumni world travelers, it has a 5-star rating, the only one in all of Zambia, which makes it a first-class hotel. It is within 300 yards of the famous Victoria Falls, a 100-room double-storied building, completely air conditioned.

Perhaps to tell you a bit about Zambia will help you understand, in part, my enthusiasm for the AAMP program. And, as an aside, I am certain our newly organized Management Development Program at Bryant will do a similar job with U. S. executives who have management responsibilities.

Zambia is a country of approximately 290,000 square miles, the size of Texas and one-half of Mississippi. It is high plateau of 3,500 to 4,500 feet above sea level, but in the northeast the mountains exceed 7,000 feet. Although it lies in the tropics, the high altitude makes a pleasant climate. The economy is decidedly influenced by copper mining.

Victoria Falls, where we met, is primarily a resort area that lies just seven miles north of Livingstone. Named for Dr. David Livingstone, the British explorer, it was for a time the capital of Zambia. However, it became necessary to locate the capital in Lusaka, a more centralized locale, as the territory developed.

Livingstone is an important tourist and agricultural area, and the administrative center for the Southern Province, but it is still a small town. On a sunny day the mists rising from Victoria Falls seven miles to the north appear as smoke on the horizon.

Our AAMP sessions began Monday morning, June 4, when we met for breakfast at 7:30 a.m. Our group numbered 36. Our goal was to use case studies, plant tours, and computerized exercises to develop and refine management talents in each of the participants. Each man paid $475 tuition, a startlingly high amount when one realizes that the average annual income in East Africa is approximately $100. Most were sponsored by their company or their community. We expected each man to participate in discussion, with the day divided into five periods of “team study” and “class periods.” Tea breaks at 10:15 a.m. and 4:00 p.m., and lunch at 12:30 p.m. offered time for more informal conversation.

After the afternoon tea break, it was expected the student would spend two and one-half hours in independent study to prepare for the next day’s classes. After dinner at 8:00 p.m. they had time to relax, but I believe most of them went back to their rooms to study.

We used the case study for our daily discussions. For those alumni who might not be familiar with it, a case is an objective description of a real life situation in which a manager is required to take action and is responsible for the results. Generally, a case is organized around one or more problems or issues being confronted by management in an organization. The case describes the problem area and contains sufficient additional information about the organization and its setting to permit meaningful analysis and the development of action recommendations. The case focuses on the problem issues, rather than to portray a success or failure story. It may run from one to thirty typewritten pages, but usually averages ten. Some of our current Bryant faculty use case studies.

I am sometimes asked whether there are opportunities for new industry in Zambia, and whether I would want to live there if I were a business executive in Africa. The answer to both questions is “yes”, with this reservation to the first question.

With an economy that is so largely copper oriented, mining and processing of this ore is the dominant industry. The other major industries are those connected with the manufacture of iron and steel goods, saw milling, tire retreading, wood and joinery manufacture, processing of food and drink, and the manufacture of cement and cement products.

Among the more recently established plants are a Land Rover assembly plant, a plant producing ammonium nitrate fertilizer, a steel galvanizing plant, a tobacco processing and packing plant, and an aluminum products factory.

The major constraint to Zambia’s industrial growth is the scarcity of skilled Zambian laborers. The tax system encourages private enterprise. There is a 50% tax on the import of all luxury goods, which encourages the use of domestic products.

I returned to Smithfield in early June, arriving in Boston via Lusaka and Rome stopovers, to participate in Bryant’s Commencement activities. I wanted to share this experience with you so that you might be aware that Bryant College is represented in the kind of academic setting that helps build professional leadership.

The potential for individual professional growth in similar programs within our new Office of Management Development Programs at Bryant is an important goal of our College, and I expect the Office to grow rapidly.

Harry F. Evans
President, Bryant College
There it was, looking like any ordinary computer terminal, its "green-eyed" display panel staring blankly. The exception was that it was in the Bryant College Library, out of sight for the normal visitor, and working away without any complaint that it had been pushed into a corner.

One of the delays experienced by any library is the time between the arrival of a new book and the time it takes to make up the cross-indexed catalog cards before it can be put on the shelf for circulation. Hand typing the cards can be tremendously tedious, time-consuming, and costly.

With our new terminal, which is tied into the New England Library Network (NELINET), the task is shortened to from 6 to 8 seconds to produce the cards from a computer bank of information in Ohio. The finished cards are returned to the College in about a week.

Once the computer bank is accessed and the new book at Bryant's Library added to its data, any library that has such a terminal can share the data. For instance, if a particular book were requested for research and was not in our collection, by using the terminal it could be determined which library in the country had a copy. Then, by means of the interlibrary loan system, a copy of the book could be obtained for use here or a facsimile of the article transmitted to Bryant.

Alumni are invited to use the Bryant Library for research and as a resource for study and enjoyment.

We welcome our former Dean and associate back at Bryant.

Hedley Smith '35
Authors New Book

The Yankee Yorkshireman is the title of a new book by a Bryant alumnus, born in Bradford, England, but currently residing in North Scituate, Rhode Island, Hedley Smith.

His book is largely autobiographical. His parents were among those affected by a severe economic depression in England following the enactment of the McKinley tariffs in the early 1900's.

The book is enjoyable reading, especially for those whose imagination can assist them to share the lives of English textile emigrants who settled in Rhode Island in the early years of the twentieth century. The fictionalized experiences of such delightful characters as Squire Widdop, Maud and Martha Binns, the Reverend Drup King, and other inhabitants of the mill village of Briardale, are based upon history and the experiences of Hedley Smith as he was growing up.

The book is published by Harlo Press, Detroit, Michigan. His first book, Gift of Armor, is the story of the founding of Warwick, Rhode Island, and still enjoys a wide popularity.
