ALUMNI FUND

Karl F. Ericson '58 General Chairman of the 1975 Annual Fund, indicates that leadership giving has put the Fund 37% ahead of last year's Fund as of January 7.

Rising costs and increasing need for financial aid to qualified students are among the factors affecting Bryant and other private colleges. Alumni support has been of tremendous help to students for scholarships, new library equipment, and audio-visual resources.

The goal of the 1975 Annual Fund is to purchase additional furnishings for the Library and continue alumni support for scholarships for worthy students.

Your gift can make the difference. We are depending on you. Please donate as generously as you can. Send your check to us today.

THE IDEA of WOMEN'S EQUITY
By Joan F. Marsella

The great French novelist, Victor Hugo, once said, "No army can withstand the force of an idea whose time has come."

To illustrate his wisdom, let me list three great ideas whose time came and they prevailed against all forces of reversal.

1. Anti-imperialism, an idea which toppled the greatest political powers of the 19th Century.
2. Anti-slavery, an idea which disrupted the economic structure of America and precipitated a bloody civil war.
3. Organized labor, an idea so infectious that it overwhelmed the industrial structure of America and now spreads to every organizational system, fragmenting the powers of management.

I declare that the idea of women's equity has come and that the combined counter-forces of political censure, moral judgement, and economic discrimination will fail.

Twenty years ago, a Swedish sociologist named Gunnar Myrdahl wrote in The American Dilemma, that the position of women here was equivalent to the bondage of slaves in an earlier America. Few heeded his observation in 1954 because the time had not yet come. But that was 20 years ago.

Today there are supportive factors. Among them are: the rising level of education in the general public; an advanced technology which reduces household drudgery and permits women the option of refusing or to bear children when, where, how and by whom they choose; an extended life span, more generous to women than men; a rising ideology which rejects tradition and advances a new humanism.

Men and women are groping for control of their lives and rejecting determinism by race, sex, age, and social criteria. It is an ideology equally liberating for men as for women for they will no longer measure their performance by standards created by long-dead military historians or Cecil B. DeMille.

New values require that women pull their own weight and relieve men of their special form of bondage, that of sole economic provider for the entire family, a life-long sentence. It is a reprieve in which men should rejoice when one considers the current cost of raising a child from birth through graduation from the state university — a mere $40,000, according to last year's calculations — not this year's inflationary costs.

I will explore three influences on the status of women in western civilization, religion, law, and psychology. I will discuss two significant factors propelling women's advancement in business. Finally, I shall discuss how behavior between men and women must change.

First for religion: the Roman Catholic Church, though supported by women, victimizes her own supporters. Early Christian zealots, fearing the influence of women on the faithful, warned against the contaminating effects of association with women. Marriage was, according to doctrinal definition, a corrupt concession to the flesh — a last resort for the weak who could not withstand the torture of unsatisfied sexuality. But, said St. Paul, in his Letter to the Corinthians, keep them away from the public forum, out of the ministry, and in subordination to their husbands. Today, Pope Paul decrees, they be subordinate to their own bodies. They must not seek abortion, he said, even if their own lives are threatened or they are doomed to bear a child destined to eternal childhood and eventual institutionalization.

The legal definition of women was shaped by the great British jurist, Sir William Blackstone, whose theories on common law are the basis for the American equivalent. He warned against according any property rights to a wife for to do so would be to acknowledge her separate existence, when in fact, she had none apart from her husband.

For the psychological damage done to women, let's turn to the great Sigmund Freud, whose ideas are basic to modern psychiatric theory and practice. Though a lover of women, Freud was no friend to them. He saw woman as an incomplete man who spent her life in imitation of her idol. This task, of course, could not be accomplished, so woman was doomed to neurosis for refusal to accept her own incomplete body and predetermined destiny. "Anatomy is destiny," he said. Her moral and psychologically healthy role was subordination to her master, her husband.

What socio-political circumstances exist today which alter these archaic attitudes toward women? From many, I select two for our discussion. First: It is women's growing awareness of their historical, political, religious, economic, and biological exploitation. From the efforts of early courageous women in the movement there arises a massive challenge to the assumption of the inherent superiority of men. At first this was equally affrontive as was Copernicus' challenge to the idea that the sun was the center of the universe.

The original storm troopers in the women's movement were from the middle class and their objectives were scorned by working class mothers who saw a challenge to the sacrosanct idea of morally superior domesticity. Blue collar women today are beginning to see the sense (read “cents” as in dollars) and in gains accomplished by political activity of their college-bred sisters. Seeds of discontent are now sown in the cerebella of the Edith Bunkers of this world. It is unnecessary for me to say more about inevitable consequences for Archie and his friends.

The second monumental fact is the growth of Uncle Sam as an employer in the area of civil service. Jane Dough has learned of push jobs with attractive expense accounts, open-end airline tickets, power commands and deference patterns.

She is discovering, with considerable success, her eligibility. The Fulton Committee Survey on Comparative Advances of Men and Women reported that the civil service is a particularly enlightened employer of women, making no ostensible discrimination against them in pay or prospects, yet . . . “All the signs are that they compete on less than equal terms with men.” The same report states that the old guard which was affronted to the point of apoplexy at the thought of women within the managerial level have generally retired.

In the area of private business there is an even more significant turn of events called Affirmative Action. John Q. Citizen has ever been willing to collaborate in business with Uncle Sam. Indeed it has become increasingly more difficult to survive without government contracts — but there are strings.

A private business owner surrenders autonomy, for this person can no longer choose employees at will. Affirmative Action directives call for planned integration of minority groups members (which for the uninformed, includes women), at every level; equal pay for equal work; open recruitment for all vacancies. This unwelcome procedure is one about which the now semi-private employer has no choice, if that person wishes to maintain government contracts.

To the idea of men and women working as peers there can be a variety of reactions — most require adjustments; all are influenced by earlier experiences with the opposite sex.

Carolyn Bird, a rational and intelligent spokeswoman for women in business, comments on sex peergre relationship in her book, Everything A Woman Needs to Know to Get Paid What She is Worth. If Title VII, which is now a law, were fully enforced, she states, there would be no basis for the assumption that financial support of the family by the husband-father is a gift from the male to the female and that the male is, therefore, entitled to preference in the outside world. She further suggests that women have no monopoly on bitchiness, malingering, touchiness, suspiciousness, and petty-attention getting. These are reactions to the condition of being unequal in a dependent, close, personal relationship and are evident behavior patterns among slaves, children, male secretaries, soldiers cooped up in barracks, and among assistants to presidents.

Her study consisted of interviews with women who have made it to the top in large organizations. Of each respondent she asked, “Wouldn’t you rather be adored than treated as an equal?” Most said no; that this was a suffocating experience in which the romantic ideal of the partner is projected to the woman, restricting her growth and development. Most saw the idea of adoration as doomed to disenchantment.

Women in general are finding out that the contract called marriage, which under the old system, was an exchange of guaranteed domestic services and sexual availability for a life of financial support, was not too well negotiated as far as they are concerned. All fringe benefits fall to management. Probably the simplest way to state the new mood of women is that they no longer see themselves as sex objects, nor sex per se as the aim and purpose of women’s life. I am certain that you will recognize this attitude as the one always supported by men.

Feminists strive to destroy attitudinal barriers confronting women in high places. These were built not by accident but through deliberate socializing processes. They are the strongest means by which dominators can exert social control over those they dominate. In the process, women must find the strength to endure such bitter invectives as “man hater” or “lesbian.” They must also abandon manipulative behavior, accept risks which accompany competition, and suppress the desire to be the “only woman in the department.”

One avenue that seems virtually closed to women is that of the protegee. This route is often the most expeditious for aspiring young men to “fill the old man’s shoes.” Few old boys are willing to pass along the tribal mystique to an aspiring woman, for to admit she could do one’s job would undermine its importance. There is also some evidence that the old boy’s wife is less than happy about public praise for a female apprentice and the time involved in training her.

Business management is hampered by limited peer contacts with the opposite sex. For the majority, the most recent peer contact occurred in college.

Eleanor Schwartz and James Rago of the Management faculty of Cleveland State University state the principal concern to be one in which a male is dependent on a female for personal fulfillment. He may have ego needs — the need to validate manhood; the need to satisfy nutriment not provided by a parent; the need to punish a sister. Defensive behavior arises from these unfulfilled needs and the man may force the woman associate into need-fulfillment role playing. New information which does not fit the role set is either censored or distorted to fit this closed-personality system. If the woman allows herself to be drawn into such a relationship, she becomes part of the system. Schwartz states that the greater a man’s chronic dependency need to-toward women, the stronger will be his need to control them, and the resistant to change.

How can a woman react to this closed system? There are five options: 1) hide, keep a low profile; 2) feed his deprivations by becoming indispensable; 3) resist passively; 4) war openly; 5) tactfully but aggressively resist by offering professional support but no game playing! Which do you suggest?

The process of re-learning is one which requires the total cooperation of the learner. It cannot be forced. There are among us some who are refreshed by change and, therefore, welcome women's equity. There are some who select aspects of equality which seem attractive, (the willing check splitters). There are still a few who resist any challenge to the prevailing dominance structure for they think they have much to lose. In this they are mistaken.

Serving with me on a special commission to the Governor is a president of one of the leading banks of Rhode Island. Recently, he told me of an incident which, I believe, illustrates the resistance of the old guard to sexual peerage. He confided how, in the spirit of enlightenment, (which I knew to be Title VII), he had appointed a woman as mortgage officer of the bank. She could not continue, so he said, because she was offered mortgage payments with interest which were not in the "official coin of the realm." A woman could not cope with such sexual advances from borrowers therefore, so he said, she had to be relieved of that post.

My banker friend was unwittingly telling me that: 1) a woman must not hear an information leak about payments men do receive which are not spelled out in fine print on the mortgage contract, and 2) he was reacting as a protector or paternalist toward this woman, as though she were his own wife or daughter.

You may wonder how I responded to the banker. I said simply, "When Peter tells us about Paul, we learn more about Peter than we do about Paul."

Now let’s address the where, the why, and the when of the issue. Where are women's chances for promotion in business the best?

To research this issue, Schwartz and Rago surveyed 500 large businesses from the Fortune Directory and 300 small businesses from the Small Business Directory. The results were published in a study entitled, The Sex Barrier in Business. From this comprehensive overview, it is evident that the ages of persons in the power structure are more significant than the nature of the particular business. Corporations which employ young people at every level were found to be the least authoritarian. Why? It seems that young men are undaunted by fears of unisex. They seem to prefer a cooperative life style. One young male executive respondent was reported as having said, "Men who do complain about women in top positions have never worked with women holding responsible positions. Once they do, they lose their biases. There are no measurable and important differences between men and women with respect to intelligence, ability, and aptitude. Attitudes at home, work, and by society have been the roadblock."

When will sexual peerage in business become a reality? In 1980, according to this study — a year coincident with the entry of most of today’s students into influential management levels. It seems that sexual peerage will be their experience and that they are destined to be change agents in society.

The idea of women’s equity has come. Neither the Army, nor the civil service, nor the private business sector can withstand its force.

There is a saying in the common wisdom — if you can’t lick, join ‘em!

And that is my counsel to you — try it, you’ll like it.

FACULTY HONORS

Ph.D. For Wood

Assistant Professor of Mathematics Wallace A. Wood earned his Ph.D. from Boston College in November.

The title of his dissertation was "A Significance Test for Ordering Theory."

Ordering theory as proposed by Airasian and Bart is a deterministic measurement model which extends Guttman's scalogram analysis to include non-linear hierarchies. Basic to the identification of hierarchies by ordering theory is the prerequisite relationship between two items. Like scalogram analysis, ordering theory has no provision for dealing with random error in response patterns.

To overcome this limitation, ordering theory uses a preset tolerance level that limits the number of disconfirmatory response patterns that will be accepted before a prerequisite relationship between two items is denied. The lack of a suitable statistical test for the prerequisite relationship between two items has hindered the development of a significance test for use with the hierarchies obtained from an ordering theory analysis.

This study devised a significance test for ordering theory analyses based upon the total number of prerequisite relationships between all item pairs that exist for a set of items. The test takes into consideration the number of subjects, the tolerance level, the difficulty level of each item, and the number of items.

The values of these four parameters are used to obtain a probability distribution for the expected value of the total number of prerequisite relationships under the assumption that the items are independent. Since each set of values of the four parameters may engender a different probability distribution for the total number of prerequisite relationships, it was necessary to devise an algorithm to derive this probability distribution for each set of the four parameters.

In the mathematical derivation of the algorithm a mixture of binomial distributions was obtained for the distribution of the total number of prerequisite relationships. The problem of finding a probability distribution that is composed of a mixture of binomial probability distributions, each of which has possibly different values for the parameters N and p, is unsolved. A feasible alternative was to approximate each of the binomial distributions with a Poisson distribution and then to use the Poisson distribution, whose expected value was the sum of the expected values of each of the approximations, as the probability distribution for the total number of prerequisite relationships. The feasibility of the approximate probability distributions for the total number of prerequisite relationships obtained using the Poisson distribution was tested by comparing them with the sampling distributions for the total number of prerequisite relationships obtained by computer simulation.

By repeatedly simulating test results and then subjecting them to an ordering theory analysis, a probability distribution for the total number of prerequisite relationships was obtained for various sets of values of the parameters.

A goodness of fit test was used to compare the decumulative probability distributions for the total number of prerequisite relationships obtained using the algorithm with the decumulative probability distributions obtained using computer simulation.

As a result of these tests, it was concluded that the algorithm using the Poisson approximation was appropriate for low tolerance levels such as 0.01 and 0.02. The results also indicated that its use at a tolerance level of 0.05 was somewhat limited and its use at a tolerance level of 0.10 should be avoided. Use of the significance test for the total number of prerequisite relationships was then demonstrated on several sets of data.

NEW BOOKS

Bryant College is proud to announce that Dr. Peter V. Mini, Associate Professor of Economics, has written a new book entitled Philosophy and Economics: The Origins and Development of Economic Theory. It has been published by The University Press of Florida, Gainesville, Florida 32603 ($8.50).

The publisher of the book describes the book as follows:

The author terms this book an essay in intellectual history rather than a methodological study. He does not criticize economic beliefs, but attempts to explain why economists wrote what they did. Four types of economic thinking are surveyed: those of the classicists, of Marx, of Keynes, and of recent macroeconomic theorists. The content and conclusions of each form of theorizing are shown to be determined by the epistemological preconceptions of the writers. Classical economic thought was dominated by the Cartesian-Lockean belief that truth resides in the realm of concepts linked with each other mathematically.

Marx’ broader interests and his evolutionary approach are functions of his acceptance of Hegel’s theory of truth, which is opposed to Descartes’ narrow “geometrizing.” Keynes’ reaction to classical economic prescriptions follows from his adoption of “existential” modes of thought. The author interprets the macroeconomic work of the past three decades as a reversion to classical modes of thinking due to a misunderstanding of Keynes’ original method.

Professional economists and cultural historians who have read this work have been happily excited by it. Louis M. Hacker, for instance, reports: “Mini’s book is not only an original and almost startling challenge to the whole world of economic theory; if it weren’t written with such careful attention to scholarly precision, it might be called a tour de force. It clearly establishes the links of (and bondage to) economic thinking and Cartesian epistemology: the growing and mechanical (and increasingly unreal) hunt for rationality, order, and invariant law in a world which is at the mercy of the real forces of passion, struggle, bias, and even error and falsehood. The book may even turn out to be a succes de rebellion.”

Rich Harvest: A History of the Grange, 1867-100 by Dr. Dennis S. Nordin, Assistant Professor of History, was recently published by the University Press of Mississippi.

Ten years in preparation, “Rich Harvest” represents the first scholarly work devoted to the history of the Grange. Emphasis has been given in the book to the Grange’s social and educational objectives. It traces the creation of this national farm organization, its work through its chapters and with the Department of Agriculture to help eliminate the shortcomings of rural life and advance its quality.

Reared by Swedish immigrant parents in Chicago, Dr. Nordin’s interest in agricultural life was enhanced by visits to a favorite uncle’s dairy farm. He subsequently pursued his study of the agrarian movements while attending Lincoln Memorial University, Harrogate, Tennessee.

He continued his graduate study at Mississippi State University, earning both a Masters and Ph.D. degree. Dr. Nordin is also a visiting professor at Umeas and Goteborg University in Sweden.

$5,100 GRANT FOR LECTURE SERIES

Dr. Mini received his Ph.D. from Tulane University. Among his other publications are: “Foreign Direct Investment, 1956-63” which appeared in The American Journal of Economics and Sociology, and “Capital Imports and Economic Growth: The Italian Experience, 1955-1964” which appeared in Economic Development and Cultural Change.

$1,000 GRANT FROM PEAT, MARWICK MITCHELL FOUNDATION

A second $1000 grant has been given to Bryant College by the Peat, Marwick, Mitchell Foundation to be used for Bryant’s Talent Development Program.

The grant will be applied toward a program of tutorial assistance for 11 students currently enrolled in Bryant’s Talent Development Program, which makes it possible for minority-group and academically underprivileged young men and women to receive a “sound business education and the opportunity they would otherwise not have to enter the business world on its own terms.”

James N. O’Neill, Assistant Professor of English, is the author of a project proposal entitled “Human Values in Economic Systems: An Historical Perspective,” that will be funded from a $5,100 grant to Bryant College by the Rhode Island Committee of the Humanities. Under his direction a series of seminars are scheduled, examining past and present economic systems to assess human values in these systems and to determine what, if any, desirable changes in our present economic system seem necessary in light of the apparent crisis with human values in our country today.

There will be eight evening seminars, beginning Wednesday, February 19 and concluding April 16. Each will begin at 8 p.m. and the topic and speaker for each week will be announced in The Providence Journal and Woonsocket Call.

The speaker and panelists will be specialists in these diverse fields: Philosophy, Political Science, Sociology, History, Literature, and Economics. Audience participation will be solicited in the form of questions which may be directed to either the speaker or a three-member panel.

Alumni and their friends are invited; tickets are not necessary, and there is no charge. Plan to come, won’t you?

NEW BOOK BY

HEDLEY SMITH '35

Hedley Smith is the author of More Yankee Yorkshiremen, new stories about the English textile emigrants who settled the industrial towns and villages, and ran the mills, in the era of Rhode Island's textile development and dominion.

With the approach of the nation's Bicentennial Observance in 1976, his book is a timely contribution to the records of the various ethnic groups who have contributed to the development of the present-day United States, and who are becoming an increasing popular and rewarding subject of literary and historic investigation.

Mr. Smith was born in Bradford, England, and settled at an early age in Rhode Island. His writing reflects his experiences of the mills and factories and the factory towns and villages that were so prominent in Rhode Island in the earlier years of this century.

His first book, Gift of Armor, dealt with the founding of the city of Warwick, Rhode Island, but his more significant writing is concerned with recording the way of life and philosophy of the English textile workers who have settled in the State, as told in his previous volume, The Yankee Yorkshireman.
HATHAWAY RETIRES

CENTER FOR MANAGEMENT DEVELOPMENT

During the past year the Center for Management Development has been active in conducting management programs for numerous individuals and organizations in the New England region. Some of the topical areas covered have been Executive Leadership, Management and Motivation, Organization Development, Affirmative Action, Supervisory Skills, Women in Management, and Communications.

Although the Center focuses on public offerings and tailored programs for individual organizations, there is a special interest in providing unique educational opportunities for Bryant College Alumni. The Center conducted a questionnaire mailing last summer in conjunction with alumni balloting to assess interest in special programs for Alumni only. Favorable responses were received from Alumni in twenty-one states.

The alternatives available for Alumni programs are numerous and could include live-in programs for individuals, husband and wife teams, and families. By combining educational, social, and recreational activities suitable for everyone, the program would provide a most interesting and stimulating experience. If you have ideas to share with the College, please take the opportunity to contact your Alumni Association officers, the Alumni Office, or the Center.

Some of the upcoming public programs at the Center are listed herewith. If you are interested in more information, the Center welcomes all inquiries.

The Interview Process (March 19) Focusing on the interview process as an effective assessment tool, the seminar will develop factors and methods of successful interviewing and will study the evaluation of interview results.

Managing and Motivating Employees (April 18) Designed to help managers and supervisors get more and better results from others, it will focus on motivation and leadership. A results oriented human relations seminar, it is designed for everyone from first line supervisor to chief executive.

Communications and Managerial Effectiveness (April 23) The seminar revolves around communications as the critical managerial skill and will provide each person with the opportunity to assess his or her personal communications style and to become more effective in communicating with others.

Organization Renewal (May 29-30) A two-day workshop that will integrate concepts of organizational growth potential, communica-ions, teamwork, conflict, and change — elements vital to the process of continued internal development and renewal of the organization.

Middle-Management Program (June 1-13) Designed for middle-managers who have been identified as having growth potential within their organization, the two-week program will treat management in the broad sense and will not be confined to a specific functional area. The experience will be intensive, and participants will find the educational experience very demanding.

Leadership and Organization Development Laboratory (June 4-7) For the second consecutive year the Leadership Laboratory will be conducted for managers interested in increasing their effectiveness as leaders and in diagnosing and treating human relations situations in their organizations. It will be a three- and one-half day live-in experience.

The Managing Woman (June 18-20) Modeled after a successful fall program of the same title, it is designed for women currently in management positions. The workshop will present relevant management concepts in a practical framework and will give special attention to women managers in a male/female executive system.

Internal Consulting (July 10-11) The workshop will study the consulting process and the ways in which the consulting process steps are handled. It will give individuals opportunities to develop specific strategies for their own organizations.

All of the programs described are conducted by specialists from throughout the United States who are leading authorities in their respective areas.

SPORTS — THE BEST MAY BE AHEAD

The second half of the winter sports season gets under way with the basketball and hockey teams gearing up for that stretch drive that hopefully will carry them into post-season tournaments. And, fortunately for Bryant fans, most of that action will take place in Smithfield.

Basketball
The Indians have 17 games scheduled during the final weeks of the season, including 11 on their home court. At the semester break they were 6-3, one of the top records among New England Division II teams.

"Two of our three losses," says Coach Tom Folliard, "were the direct result of our poor outside shooting, when the opposition kept the ball away from us with two and three-man coverage. Last year we were 3-6 at this stage in the season, and we went on to a 20-8 record and a tournament berth. So I'm looking forward to an exciting six weeks."

Hockey
The team posted a 4-2 record in the first half of the season, and established itself as one of the leading contenders for a berth in the post-season ECAC Division III tournament.

Swimming
With only one victory in its favor, Coach Jerry Sussman's team has the promise of a successful second half of their schedule. At the half they are 1-3.

If our talent improves next year as much as it has this year, we should be able to move into the NCAA Division III rank. The record to date is deceiving because we are swimming against better teams, and in two of the three losses the score was very close and five of our first-string swimmers were out with injuries or illness.

Soccer
The most successful season in Bryant College soccer history ended abruptly as the Indians fell one game short of qualifying for the NAIA national championships.

Capping a highly successful regular season, Bryant won four playoff games (three in double overtime). Coach Gerry Guay's roster is sprinkled heavily with freshmen and sophomores indicating the best is yet to come in 1975's season.

Bowling
Bryant's varsity bowling team continues its winning ways in the Tri-State League, trailing first place University of Connecticut by one game at the half way point of the schedule. These two teams will meet March 2 at the Bryant Invitational to be held at The Cranston Bowl to decide the league championship.

Coach Roy Nelson's Keglers will spend the month of February in national competition in the Eastern Intercollegiate Bowling Conference and the American College Union schedules.
